The interplay between lipid metabolism and protein-protein interaction: molecular connections in neurodegeneration. Research in the field of neurodegenerative diseases has made tremendous progress in the last decade. Although the outcome of more than 20,000 clinical trials was disappointing, the contributions of small molecules to the field are continuously increasing. However, much of our knowledge has been gained by using cell models that are very far from the physiological conditions found in humans. Despite the advancement in the understanding of the molecular mechanisms involved in neurodegeneration, most of the approaches used in the past have not been able to stop or delay their progression. This may be attributable to two factors. First, there is a need to shift the paradigm from "targeting a given protein" to "targeting a complex of proteins" and second, the cellular system is extremely complex and the inhibition of a single protein or pathway will not be enough to stop the overall progression. In this review, we will discuss how some advances in the field of cholesterol and sphingolipid metabolism are able to expand our understanding of the physiopathology of neurodegenerative diseases and how this knowledge will contribute to the development of therapies in the near future.
